

SHADA

ASSASSIN · SCOUT · TRACKER

The Price of Freedom

CHARACTER BOARD · CH-006

CHARACTER OVERVIEW

A compact mercenary infiltrator whose danger comes from observation, timing and precise movement rather than physical dominance. Mostly human, with inherited serpentine ancestry that surfaces only at the edges — the temples, the jawline, the side of the neck, and fine scales across her bare shoulders and forearms.

STORY FUNCTION

Terrain, scent, access routes, where a frightened person would go and where they would hide. In a hunt across a forest world she is the most useful person on the payroll, and she works alone by preference.

FIRST IMPRESSION

- Belongs in this forest
- Notices everything
- Wastes no movement
- Patient before explosive
- Could disappear at any moment

She is how the crew finds people.

Her skin carries inherited scales. Her armour carries metal ones. She wears her own ancestry as protection, and nobody in the film ever remarks on it.

WEAPONS & EQUIPMENT

Combat knife. Her left hip, grip up, cross-draw with the right hand.

Compact blaster. Her right thigh, drop-leg holster, right-hand draw.

Climbing and infiltration kit. Nothing else.

— She is right-handed, and nothing she carries is mirrored. Her right side takes the gauntlet and the blaster; her left takes the shoulder cap, the knife and the thigh patch. That diagonal is deliberate.

— Her armour is scrap metal cut small and laced on — a loose cap of blackened iron off one shoulder, a dark bronze patch on one thigh, two unmatched panels over her ribs laced up the front, from scavenging trips years apart. The one rigid piece is the printed gauntlet on her right forearm, a few dim lights at the wrist still working. No breastplate, and no matched pair of anything. Nobody made it for her.